Question/Comment
Banning natural gas seems to be completely the wrong idea. Just in water heating alone they obviously have not taken into the consideration the energy savings of having a high efficiency tankless water heater only running when water is on demand versus an electric that heats continually. This also will create the need for more of the very costly windmills that are being put up all over eastern Washington. I think they need to come to the east side and see how well they work when the wind is not blowing. Also, the need for solar farms that work well at night. Clearly the effort to remove natural gas is strictly political and not logical.
